

Once upon a time, says the New York Tribune, three little boys who were playing about with the other children came to the larger opening of a great horn. After looking in a short time, they concluded to enter, as they thought it would be rare sport to pass through it. As they were about to go in, some of the larger and older boys warned them against it. "Don't you know," said the wisest boy, "that this is the wrong end—we will never come out of the little end of the horn." And the little boys were right after all—they didn't come out of the little end of the horn. "Oh, yes," they replied, "but we were not like the crowd—we will never come out of the little end of the horn." And the little boys were right after all—they didn't come out of the little end of the horn. "Oh, yes," they replied, "but we were not like the crowd—we will never come out of the little end of the horn." And the little boys were right after all—they didn't come out of the little end of the horn.

When they entered the horn it was broad and high, and very light, and cool and pleasant. The talking was good, and they had only to go straight ahead, hand in hand. And they were very happy, you may be sure, never having been in a horn before, so all was new to them. "This is indeed a rare treat," cried George William, as he looked about him. "Do you not enjoy it, my dear George?" "Oh, I do not think I ever enjoyed anything more!" exclaimed George. "And I hope Master Godkin is happy also!" "Oh, yes, Master Godkin thought it was a good thing, and so they trudged on, hand in hand, singing the pretty songs they had been taught.

After some time they noticed that the horn was gradually growing smaller, and that it was beginning to curve. Still there was plenty of room for them to proceed, and they only sang the louder. "Ah, my kind mates!" cried George William, "it is only so the more pleasant to have this great horn smaller—it makes it less lonesome." "Yes indeed," said George William, returned George, "and it is much more interesting when it curves a little. Pray see Master Godkin smile!" "Ah, true George, what a pleasure it is, to be sure to see Master Godkin smile! Ah, Master Godkin is so respectable!"

As they went on the horn continued to grow smaller and smaller and more crooked. And they noticed that the light was failing them, and that it was growing quite cold. But they only buttoned up their jackets and put on Master Godkin's mittens for him and said walked bravely on. "After all," said George William, "perhaps we shall have to go out of the small end. But I can see nothing about it which we should fear. No one will see us, and we can run round and rejoin our playmates, can we not, dear George?" "Oh, yes we can and I shall be willing to go out that way—it is only a prejudice people have against the small end of the horn—it is as good as the other," replied George. Master Godkin said that for his part he had intended going out of the sharp end and all the time.

So our three little truants passed on, though the way was now very narrow, and dark, and cold, and they did not sing their little songs any more. They could only feel their way along, and it was very crooked and slippery. Their teeth chattered with the cold, and they knew not what dangers might be near them. They only kept together by clinging closely to one another's hands as they stumbled on in the darkness. "Ah, I long for the light, even if it be at the little end," sighed George William. "If we get out, I will never enter another horn by the wrong end." Do not despair, George William, answered George, "we will get out soon, though it is true that we should never have entered the way we did. But do not be discouraged. Master Godkin is not discouraged."

But it was only a little after this that these boys saw the terrible position they were in. The horn had grown so small that they could only proceed on their hands and knees, and they rightly concluded that they must be near the end. "But still I can see no light at the end of an opening," said George William, as he swallowed a great lump in the throat. "Ah, it is little farther on around the curve," said he. "Get down and crawl, and you will soon see it." "Oh, no, George, oh, no," replied George William; "you crawl, George, as you are a great crawler; many are the times I have admired your crawling abilities. Crawl ahead, George, crawl ahead—the crawl is your specialty, you know." So George got down very flat and crawled on, and George William and Master Godkin followed. In another moment George gave a cry as of pain: "Alas, my dear comrades, it is all over with me—I am at the end and there is no little opening! This is one of these kind of horns that has no hole in the small end!" "Well you may say that," cried George William. "We are indeed in a serious plight. Who would have thought it was this kind of a horn?" "Who, indeed?" returned George, "but it is. I am wedged in so that I cannot move." "So am I," replied George William. "I cannot stir, hand nor foot. Alackaday! This is terrible! Ah, I wonder if Master Godkin can move?" "My dear boys," answered Master Godkin, "I can swim." "Ah, well," replied George, "as long as Master Godkin can swim let us keep our courage, and perhaps somebody may come along some time and saw off the end of this terrible horn and let us out. He need not saw off but just a little; we can go through a very small hole."
